If it's not marked, it's not worth it

From our research it's apparent that unmarked and often poor quality cable is still finding its way onto the UK marketplace. If installed it could prove to be downright lethal. With no markings on the cable it's difficult to know its origins and more importantly whether you can trust that it's safe to install.

At Draka, we're saying "if it's not marked, it not worth it" and we would like you to join our campaign by sending us examples of any unmarked cables you might come across to help us uphold the high standards we set.
